

THE PURTY KITCHEN

BAR KITCHEN LOFT
3-5 OLD DUNLEARY RD, DUN LAOGHAIRE

EST. 1728.

FROM THE MIDDLE AGES

From the middle ages onwards, Dunleary was the haven for ships awaiting entry to Dublin Bay. Though the roads were rocky, narrow and winding, there was lots of coach traffic between Blackrock and Dunleary, particularly during the summer months. And wherever there was coach travel, there was a necessity for inns to accommodate and provide sustenance to the weary pilgrims who travelled these roads.

ESTABLISHED 1728

2

A gentleman named James Conyngham acquired the first licence here at what is now known as The Purty Kitchen, to meet the needs of travellers. But this was also a renowned seafaring inn and a favourite of mariners. The original inn, a thatched roof, makeshift building constructed of clay, straw and wood, housed coach travellers overnight providing food, warmth and potent ales and wines. There was a large yard to the rear where horses were fed, rested and exchanged. Common to other coaching inns, the innkeepers would have kept many farm animals: pigs, hens, ducks, geese and cattle, which were then slaughtered for consumption at the inn. For the first 40 years of its existence this house was known at different times as the Old Dunleary Inn and The Mariner's Inn.

THE HARBOUR INN

In 1757 the name of this old inn changed to The Harbour Inn, as a consequence of Dunleary being designated as a harbour of refuge following construction work decreed by an Act of Parliament. In the following decades the harbour became an essential sea haven to shelter large ships and fishing vessels in unfavourable weather.

A MIGHTY PURTY KITCHEN

There is speculation about how the bar acquired its current name, The Purty Kitchen. The local narrative is that an American visitor, who had embarked at Kingstown port, walked up to the door of No. 4 and said to the proprietress, “Say Ma’am, you sure have a mighty purty kitchen.”

Whatever the origin of the name, we do know the premises in this era once again established a successful food and drinks business attracting business from voyagers, visitors, commercial travellers and local residents alike.
